Rising temps could cause as many as 2,100 fatal injuries per year

However, new research has estimated that even if the rise in temperatures is limited to just two degrees, there will be 2000 extra deaths each year in the U.S. alone.

If global temperatures rose by 3.5F (2C), researchers calculated there would be as many as 2,100 additional deaths annually from the same causes.

From 1980 to 2017, more than 4.1 million boys and men and over 1.8 million girls and women died from an injury in the contiguous U.S., accounting for 9.3% and 4.2% of all male and female deaths respectively during that time period.

Models showed a 1.5 degree Celsius increase in the global average temperature was associated with an annual increase of 1,600 fatal injuries, while a 2 degree increase produced an increase of 2,100 fatalities.

The fact that climate change affects human health is not news. But deaths from various types of injuries are known to vary by season.

The research, published in the journal Nature Medicine, is based on data on recorded deaths from injuries in every county in the mainland USA between 1980 to 2017.

These numbers were chosen because countries in the Paris Agreement are committed limiting the increase in temperatures to 2.7F (1.5C). But deaths from injuries currently make up about 10% of all fatalities around the world and the impact of global heating on this had been little studied until now. More than 95% of male injury deaths and 94% of female injury deaths occurred in those age 15 years and older, and over half of male injury deaths occurred in those between 15 and 44, the study found.

The reasons deaths from suicide and violent assault increase in hot weather are not fully understood. "Of all male excess deaths, 92% would occur in those aged 15-64 years, who have higher rates of deaths from transport and suicide". During warm weather, people tend to be out on the roads more, drink more alcohol, and be less skilled in their driving - all of which increase the odds of accidents.

Meanwhile, these increases would be partly offset by a decline in deaths from falls in middle-aged and elderly people during the winter months. Deaths from traffic accidents may increase because higher temperatures tend to result in greater overall road traffic (at least in North America), erosion of driving skills, and increased alcohol consumption.

Though increases in violence and suicides wasn't as pronounced as drownings and transport accidents, the new research suggests higher temperatures are associated with increases in intentional fatalities.

However, some of these connections are tentative and more research will be necessary to work out the cause and effect relationships.

Parks said he was "particularly surprised at how consistent the association between anomalously warm temperatures and suicide/assault deaths".

He added: "The need for climate change mitigation underpins all of this action, and large-scale structural changes will provide that opportunity for mitigation, while also reducing the vulnerability of particular groups to injury deaths".

If temperatures continue to climb as a result of climate change, hundreds more people in the United States are likely to succumb to fatal injuries. "We must respond to this threat with better preparedness in the areas of emergency services, social support and health warnings".

In a commentary on the paper also published in the journal Nature Medicine, a pair of scientists not involved in the study wrote that it is important to note that other variables of weather which are linked to injuries like rain, humidity, sunshine, and wind "may act in their own right while also interacting with temperature, although not necessarily in consistent or predictable fashions".

"Increases in assaults may be due to increasing anger levels and more time spent outdoors interacting with other people during warmer weather".
